20. Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow:

Many rules which involve legal obligations are made by Acts of Parliament and they are then known as statute law. Before any rules derived from an Act of Parliament have the force of law the Government or one or more members of Parliament must present a bill setting out the proposed rules in exact terms. The bill must be read and approved by the Parliament before it can receive the formal assent of the President. Thereafter it becomes law and is placed upon the Statute Book.

When there is no statute law applicable, the judge must find his solution to the problem by other methods. After he has heard all the relevant facts he must consider what recognized legal principles are to be applied before he delivers his judgement. When a judgement is delivered in the High Court or the Supreme Court, the judgement becomes almost invariably part of the law of the land in the same way as Statute Law. The judgement delivered by a judge becomes what is called a 'precedent' and every judge is bound by the precedent.

There is one other source which has greatly enriched the legal system.

It is known as ‘equity’ and lawyers speak of equity and the equitable jurisdiction of the courts. Equity in our law contains the principles of justice, used to correct laws when they would apply unfairly in special circumstances.

a. By what illustration does the writer point out the necessity of law in every phase of life?
b. Who generally frames the rules involving legal obligations?
c. How are they called before they gain the force of law?
d. Describe the method by which a judge finds his solution when there is no statute law.
e. When is the equitable jurisdiction used?
